

Offices in the future will be modular and hybrid with a focus on Quiet space and wellbeing

2025 is tipped to be the year people are returning to their physical offices for 3 days as a minimum.

The open-plan office, once hailed as a beacon of collaboration and creativity, has come under scrutiny in recent years. While fostering interaction is valuable, the constant buzz of activity can be detrimental to focus and well-being. This is where the need for quiet spaces in the office becomes paramount.

Open floor plans can disrupt concentration. Studies have shown a link between noise distractions and decreased productivity, with some estimates suggesting a drop of up to 66% in individual focus tasks. Constant interruptions, whether from phone calls, conversations, or even keyboard clicks, can derail thought processes and hinder the completion of complex tasks.

Beyond Introverts: The Universal Need for Quiet

Introverts are often stereotyped as the sole beneficiaries of quiet spaces. However, research suggests that everyone benefits from periods of solitude. Even extroverts require focused work time, and a quiet space provides the ideal environment for deep thinking, problem-solving, and creative brainstorming. It allows employees to process information effectively and generate high-quality work.
